

LYNN DIE ENGLAND AND HER GREAT ENTHUSIASM

An essay.

VALENTIN BURA

"... and their blood shall be upon them."

— The Leviticus

I'll be damned, here comes your ghost again...

goes the truly heartfelt lyric.

I will never forget the YouTube segment in which George W. Bush is escorted out of the White House by five or six thugs dressed in expensive Gucci.

George meant business. 9/11 was a huge form of disrespect. And George wanted to go to the end with the War on Terror.

Yet there he was, escorted by six thugs to the helicopter, and from there... who knows where?? Perhaps his own involvement with Masonry was something that wouldn't have been auspicious?? Who knows about these things really...

But George was a great man, a great hero. He wasn't going to take that bullshit on the chin.

He was going to give the well-measured answer to these Assyrian guys that are almost everywhere these days, twenty-five years later...

So, George, I'll be damned indeed.

Here comes your ghost again...

You never seem to get old these days, George...

well, your ghost doesn't, really...

Yet, who knows really about these things. The real Robert Zimmerman may still be “alive” in a bucket somewhere, and still writing about a hundred songs per five units of time. Who knows, really, that’s my point...?

Lynndie England was an American soldier, deployed in Iraq.

And she took some photos at some stage, half of which were heavily photo-shopped.

When you deal with such human filth on a day to day basis, you kind of learn to despise them. Then, you learn much more about who they are and what they have done...

I am not proposing torture as a solution here. That thing is not a solution. Prisoners belong behind bars and that should be the end of the entire story.

Prisoners should in fact be treated humanely. We know this after two thousand years of Western civilization...

And not even the Death Penalty should be something that we do in this day and age of immeasurable moral and scientific progress.

But yes. I think Lynndie England learned her lesson... the hard way...

And her lesson was not to take pictures while on the job. She did learn her lesson.

Honestly!!
